

The Globe and Laurel, Slow March

In 1935 the Royal Marines had the honour of guarding Buckingham Palace. As part of the ceremony of "Changing of the Guard" they required a slow march. A slow march which included the old English air "Early One Morning" in the arrangement was chosen. It was used, unofficially, as the Corps' slow march until the adoption of "Preobrajensky" in 1964. The title of the march refers to the regimental cap badge of the Royal Marines, the main parts of which are a globe surrounded by laurel leaves.

The Lion and Crown - "Royal" regiment. This honour was conferred by George III in 1802 'in consideration of the very meritorious services of the Marines in the late war'.

Gibraltar - The capture and defeat of Gibraltar in 1704 was considered by George IV to be one of the most glorious achievements of the Royal Marines, and that it should therefore appear as part of their emblem and represent the numerous honours they had earned.

'The Great Globe Itself' - by laurels. George IV chose this symbol to represent the Marines' successes in every quarter of the world. The laurels are believed to honour the gallantry they displayed during the capture of Belle Isle in 1761.

The Fouled Anchor - incorporated into the emblem in 1747, is the badge of the Lord High Admiral and indicates that the Corps is part of the Royal Navy.

Per Mare Per Terram - "By Sea By Land" is the motto of the Royal Marines. It is believed to have been used first in 1775
